

Why does a critique that nearly everyone accepts change almost nothing?

We are asked to hold a view on every catastrophe and given the power to act on almost none. Drawing on Nietzsche and Fromm, phenomenology and experimental psychology, clinical ethics and political theory, this book argues that the strain is not cognitive dissonance but responsibility without efficacy, and that a culture fluent only in refusal, facing an authority with no face, reaches for a villain or for an agentless noun. Neither meets the need.

The way out is not better beliefs or stronger resolve. It is better arrangements: the slow, unglamorous work of building norms in a medium that has had only twenty-five years to develop any, and the willingness to be bad at something in public for a while.
